The History book was never meant to be finished, only handed forward, each reader leaving a dated note in the margin rather than erasing a word of what came before. Corrections sat beside the errors they answered, so anyone who opened it later could see what had once been believed, when it was revised, and by whose hand. In time the margins became the truest part of the book, because they held not just the story but the lineage of how it came to be told.